Historical Note

The Argyle Boom Collection consists mostly of interviews conducted by students in classes taught by Edward D. "Sandy" Ives at the University of Maine in 1973 and 1975. Argyle Boom was one of several locations at which logs that had been cut upriver and floated or "driven" down the Penobscot River were sorted before being sent on to the lumber mills in Old Town, Orono, Veazie, Bangor, and Brewer, Maine from approximately 1900 to 1930. These interviews, along with associated photographs, maps, and diagrams, were the basis for "Argyle Boom," Northeast Folklore, XVII (1976). Under Ives' direction, the students consulted existing manuscript sources, sought out potential informants who had worked on the boom, conducted interviews, and wrote essays on various aspects of boom construction and operation and the daily lives of the workers. Ives then edited and rewrote these essays for publication. For more information see "Argyle Boom."

Scope and Contents

The Argyle Boom Collection consists of approximately seventy-five hours of tape recorded interviews (now digitized). The interviews deal with Argyle Boom, which was one of several locations at which logs that had been cut upriver and floated or "driven" down the Penobscot River were sorted before being sent on to the lumber mills in Old Town, Orono, Veazie, Bangor, and Brewer, Maine, from approximately 1900 to 1930. The material includes interviews with people who had worked on the boom and essays on various aspects of boom construction and operation and the daily lives of the workers.

From James E. Defenbaugh, History of the Lumber Industry in America (Chicago, 1906), Volume 2, page 54.

"The rafting ground at Argyle Boom, looking upriver from the foot of White Squaw Island. Shore logs are attached to the island by both perpendicular struts and cables, so they can be moved in and out with high and low water. Joints are being built out from the shore logs. The stray raft is in the lower left-hand corner. The men out in the river are checkers. The masses of logs in midstream are swings hanging downriver from buoys." Ernest Kennedy, interviewed by Edward D. "Sandy" Ives

Abstract: Ernest Kennedy (b. 1889) interviewed by Edward D. "Sandy" Ives, summer, 1977, at Kennedy's home in Argyle, Maine. Kennedy, 88, talks about his life working in the woods, on river drives, and on the Argyle Boom. Kennedy was the principle informant for "Argyle Boom," Northeast Folklore, XVII (1976) which explained the workings of the sorting boom on the Penobscot River where the logs from the river drives were sorted for delivery to the various saw mills. In this series of interviews he expands on the information he gave for that project and explains various models he made of the boom and other structures and equipment. He also discusses photos of logging camps and river drives. Also included are newspaper clippings and a 32 page summary of the Bible by Kennedy. (See NA 0579, 0786, 0792, 1032, 1056, 1143 for other Kennedy interviews.) Interview was part of a project that led to the issue of Northeast Folklore, XVII: "Argyle Boom."
