"Defund the police" is not the problem

Leah Savage

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.library.umaine.edu/social_justice

Part of the Higher Education Commons, Race and Ethnicity Commons, and the United States History Commons

Repository Citation
Savage, Leah, "'Defund the police" is not the problem" (2020). Social Justice: Diversity, Equity, & Inclusion. 12.
https://digitalcommons.library.umaine.edu/social_justice/12

This Opinion Piece is brought to you for free and open access by DigitalCommons@UMaine. It has been accepted for inclusion in Social Justice: Diversity, Equity, & Inclusion by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@UMaine. For more information, please contact um.library.technical.services@maine.edu.
“Defund the police” is not the problem
Last week in an interview on “Good Luck America,” former President Barack Obama called “defund the police” a “snappy slogan” that is not going to be effective in gathering support for change. To many, Obama’s statements were frustrating, to say the very least. The recognition of a movement like “defund the police” is something that people have been pushing for a long time; its prevalence is something to be proud of, not to publicly dismiss.

The fact that there is a nationally recognized push to reform our police is a huge deal. Citizens have taken to the streets, their bank accounts and the voting polls to demand real change in the U.S. “Defund the police” is a grassroots movement that has marched its way to political prevalence, and we cannot let Democrats ignore their responsibility to reflect this in their legislative activities.

Obama’s statements are promoting just that: making it possible for Democratic leaders to be let off the hook because the name of the people’s movement isn’t good enough.

In an article for Politico, Laura Barron-Lopez and Holly Otterbein explain that this is something that has already been on Black Lives Matter activists’ radar. There have been speculations that “defund the police” was responsible for Democratic politicians losing seats in the House and Senate, but the facts supporting this claim really don’t add up, especially when you consider the volume of blue voter registration following the outbreak of protests in June.

Alicia Gazara, co-founder of Black Lives Matter, calls Democrats’ dismissal of “defund the police” an insult to those who have helped to secure Joe Biden’s victory, arguing that the movement “really helped to push [Biden’s] campaign over the finish line.”

This argument can also be contested when you consider the fact that Democrats have known that our criminal justice system is broken, and if they had done something about it previously they wouldn’t have had to deal with the controversy of the phrase now. One could group Obama with these political leaders who chose to ignore a failing justice program, and so it shouldn’t be a surprise that he publicly criticized the peoples’ movement that puts Democratic leaders in a corner, forcing them to face the issue.

Obama’s comments, of course, do not directly address the issues for Democrats; he instead claims that the wording of “defund the police” quickly loses a large portion of the desired audience. While, yes, “defund” might invite thoughts that are not representative of the movement, there are a couple of things to consider here.

As argued by Sen. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez on Twitter in response to Obama’s comments, polite language is not effective in activism. It is the messages that make people uncomfortable, that make them scared, that will stick. It wasn’t until people felt uncomfortable that the demand for an unbiased justice system was granted the seriousness that it requires.

In addition to this, a poll from the Washington Post shows that the majority of people recognize that the intention of “defund the police” is not to abolish the police completely, but rather change the ways that the police operate.

People understand the intentions of this movement; those that oppose it just don’t care. The fact that many Americans cannot accept that many of our systems of governance and justice are inherently racist is not a reflection of problematic activism strategies, but rather systemic racism itself.
Franco-American women reflect on…
2 months ago · 1 comment
On Nov. 17 at 3 p.m., a group of four 4 panelists presented their views in a …

New restaurant, Kanu, to open this fall in…
4 months ago · 1 comment
Kanu, a restaurant, nightclub and entertainment destination, is set to open …

Karen Sieber speaks about hidden…
a month ago
On Tuesday Dec. 1, Karen Sieber, the Humanities Specialist at the Clement …

COVID-19 cases spike throughout Maine...
2 months ago · 1 comment
Halloween is usually one of the most fun times of the year. From the …

Racial Justice Challenge promotes…
4 months ago · 1 comment
The spring of 2020 sparked a resurgence of racial justice movements on a …

Pen for r…
3 mon…

What do you think?
0 Responses

The MaineCampus Comment Policy
Please read our Comment Policy before commenting.

0 Comments The MaineCampus Disqus’ Privacy Policy
Login
Sort by Best

Start the discussion

Maine Campus
5738 Memorial Union, Room 131
Orono, Maine 04469-5738
207-581-1273
info@mainecampus.com

Recent Posts

The “FAKE NEWS” Era Is…
(HTTPS://MAINECAMPUS.COM/2020/12/TH...
UMaine women’s hockey sweeps, men’s splits in weekend series against New Hampshire

Categories

Select Category

© Copyright 2017-2019. Maine Campus. All Rights Reserved.  