As we navigate this time of national unrest, here are some initial questions to consider as you engage in critical self-reflection:

- Education. What have you been taught about race in the U.S.? What do you know about anti-Black racism?
- Reflection. How are you thinking about ways anti-Black racism has shown up in your life on individual, professional, and systemic levels?
- Awareness. What media and information do you consume? What, if any, Black voices present in those outlets?
- Engagement. What about the current moment has moved you to action? Was your level of interest in anti-racism and/or anti-Blackness as high before the most recent incidents of police brutality? If not, why?

- Learning. Are you practicing accountability for your own learning without placing a burden on colleagues, particularly Black identified colleagues and friends, to educate you?
- Action. In the future, how can you use your knowledge of anti-Blackness and systemic racism to transform your personal and professional environments?

The aforementioned guiding questions are intended to begin an extended process of engagement and reflection. To aid in this process the list below is intended to expand your knowledge on what anti-Blackness is and how systemic racism works, offer resources on meaningful allyship, and shed light on some of the organizations that are deeply committed to this work. (Please note that this is not an endorsed or exhaustive list but an educational start to help aid in knowledge construction).
