Grace Undercover

by Fabrice B. Poussin

There is blood in the grooves of a dried-up soil our ground still screams from memories fast gone life ends again where a seed was to grow.

Mountains neighbor the deep canyons next door tightrope walkers hesitate to take on the promenade considering abysses as they stand atop a chimney to the core of a living body of molten desires for an unknown future.

The traitorous journey will continue perhaps until we open our eyes and trust, blind to the light into a final leap over the obscured depths of dying souls.
