Biographical / Historical

The University of Maine was one of many U.S. colleges and universities to offer tuition free summer courses under the Engineering, Sciences, and Management Defense Training Program which was funded by the U.S. Office of Education. The college-grade courses started on June 23, 1942, and continued for twelve weeks. The classes were for high school graduates not planning on attending college and were intended to train students in defense activities in order to fill urgently needed technical and scientific civilian positions just prior to and during World War II. There were a range of courses offered including in radio communication, materials of engineering and inspection, machine tool engineering, welding engineering, surveying and mapping, structural drafting, and analytical chemistry.
